Summary

Today, a more normal trading range for the FTSE of 81.9 points is a far cry from the 200+ points we have become accustomed to since the outbreak of conflict in Eastern Europe.

The anticipated FOMC announcement this Wednesday could have caused this “seemingly” suppressed movement for the FTSE.

The Monthly Pivot Point S1 held out today, though briefly punctured during today’s trading session.

Trend indicators suggest further downward movement; the FOMC announcement and Eastern European conflict could be the key influencers here.
