Summary

Today has been volatile throughout, especially during the Asian session and into the open of the UK session, where the FTSE fell 116 points.

Whatever anxieties there are about the FOMC pending report have been put on the back burner for now.

The FTSE seemed indifferent to our traditional and reliable Gann support and resistance levels but has found strong support on Pivot S1.

With all this being said, the FTSE has continued to trend downwards, and with FOMC just around the corner, we could see another sell-off potentially taking us to below 7000.
