Summary

The FOMC news, that many analysts had been concerned about, turned out to be of little to no effect.

At the start of the week, analysts had speculated that with an interest hike, the FTSE could plunge. However, by yesterday those fears had begun to simmer down, as other analysts started using a different narrative.

This is one of the shortcomings of avidly following “the news”, which is that what you think may happen will not happen, in fact, quite the opposite, in many cases due to other antagonistic considerations.

Also, remember that generally available news released to the public is often out of date, so if you trade off this, you can very often be on the wrong side of the market. It is out of date, because the anticipated news is often already priced in, before the news is made available to the general public.

In our FTT course, we refer to this as “perceived news” vs “actual news”. Actual news would be something like a global pandemic or the conflict in Eastern Europe.
