Summary

The FTSE has mostly recovered from its significant drops over the past fortnight.

The upward movement we have seen since March 7th was not particularly energetic today and could be a further sign of a downward trend later this week.

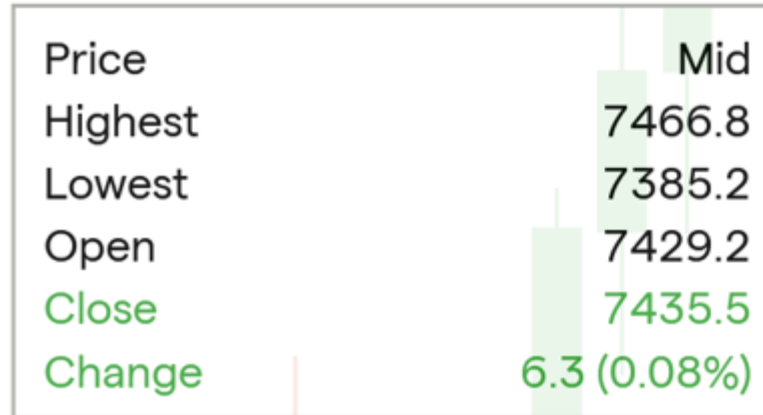

The 1-hour chart appears to be the most indicative today but does show a slowdown.

Eastern Europe is not having such a visible effect compared to previous weeks.

It hasn't gone away, and until Eastern Europe concludes, so we can still have significant volatility. There are reasons why the FTSE appears to be ready to move down, but it hasn't happened so far, so we think the FTSE still has room for further gains before a pull-down later in the week.

March 21st

A candlestick chart for March 21st. The candle is green, indicating an upward price movement. The vertical line (wick) extends from the top of the candle to a higher point, and from the bottom to a lower point. A horizontal bar is positioned at the top of the candle, representing the 'Mid' price. The 'Close' price is at the top of the candle body, and the 'Open' price is at the bottom of the candle body. The 'Highest' price is at the top of the wick, and the 'Lowest' price is at the bottom of the wick. The 'Change' is shown as a small green bar at the bottom left of the table.
